

Another bank that was swindled, and one that narrowly escaped being swindled, is the subject of the present issue of the Dispatch. The bank in question is the City of Baltimore, and the swindler is a man named Henry Nelson. The story is a long one, and it is not possible to tell it in full here. But the gist of it is that Nelson, a man of considerable wealth and influence, came to Baltimore and started a bank. He was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal. He was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal.

From the various firms and banks with which the forgers had dealings a tolerably good description of the swindler's habits and character may be gathered. He was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal.

On Friday morning about 11:45 o'clock the young man above alluded to, and who is without doubt the same person who sold the bond to William J. Harmanus, Fisher's bookkeeper, came into the banking office of Messrs. Middendorf & Oliver, and presented a check for $100,000, 4 per cent, United States bond. It was readily bought, and the buyer, a member of the firm, asked the young man how he would like to be paid, receiving the answer that he would like $24 in cash, and a check drawn to bearer for the remaining $76. This market value of the bond being $100,000, the other man came in and tendered a $50 bond of the same sort for sale. He was also accommodated with a check. About half an hour after a third party entered the office, sold a bond, and received a check drawn to G. L. Baker, of the office of Middendorf & Oliver gave the matter of buying the bonds a second thought, for the reason that each man who came happened to have been waited on by the different clerks behind the counter; but the sequel brought dismay to all hands except the clerk's. A second man, a hand-dressed young fellow, such as has already been described, walked into the Third National Bank, marched up to the outer desk, endorsed his name on the back of a check, and handed it to Mr. N. B. Middendorf, the paying-teller, to be cashed. Mr. Middendorf, who was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal.

the book, "nor to any such man," and for Mr. Middendorf's scrutiny. The light broke in upon them at once, and Mr. Middendorf, who was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal.

It was on Saturday that an attempt was also made to swindle the Western National Bank in the same manner through the unwitting medium of D. Fahnestock & Co., bankers and brokers, on South street, but this time the swindler was a man named Samuel E. Hunt, this being the name he presented. On July 8th the same man, giving his name as Henry Nelson, came and sold another bond and received a check for his own request.

On Saturday last a man with reddish side-whiskers came into Fahnestock's and sold a $100 bond, for which he received greenbacks. After getting the money he laid $50 on the counter and asked for a check for that amount, and giving his name as Henry Waterman. He received the check and left.

A little later the same man entered the Western Bank and handed to Mr. Nolting, the paying-teller, a check on Messrs. Fahnestock & Co. for $2,720. Mr. Nolting refused to cash it, and the man then left. He was identified, and resisted in his refusal to identify the man who appeared to be the signature of Mr. Fahnestock. The man then left, and never appeared again. It is to be presumed that he then turned his attention to Fisher. The man who was identified as Henry Waterman, and who was a man of great energy and ability, and he was able to attract a large number of subscribers to his bank. But he was also a man of great ambition, and he was determined to make his bank a success. He was not content with simply collecting money from his subscribers; he wanted to make a fortune. And he was willing to do anything to achieve his goal.

Major Douglas H. Carter, the cashier of the Merchants National Bank, wishes it to be understood that he does not see the forged check until after they had been honored and the party had left.
